Conference Note

LSE Public Policy Group, 2008 states that the Humanities and Social Sciences are academic disciplines dedicated to the study of society, the economy, business, governance, history and culture. The research in these disciplines contributes to a better knowledge of the human conditions, society, and societal changes and their effects on humans. The science in social sciences is inextricably linked with the whole social structure and cultural traditions. Humanities and social sciences complement science and can improve human life by combining science's heuristic and analytical power with introspective creativity. Two decades into the millennium, the world is still dealing with increasing challenges on a range of man-made and natural levels. In today's world the society has become more global, and the distinctions between disciplines are increasingly blurred. In this context, a multidisciplinary research approach is needed in the domains of humanities and social sciences since it allows scholars to get a more complete understanding of complex social phenomena. Multidisciplinary research is the blending of approaches from various disciplines, including the natural and social sciences, business and economics, medicine and psychology, yoga and sports in any given setting. Social issues are often interconnected and influenced by various factors that frequently intersect within anthropology, history, sociology, economics, political science, psychology etc. Multidisciplinary research has become more and more prominent in humanities and social sciences since it enhances the understanding of complicated societal issues from an integrated and holistic perspective. Multidisciplinary research helps the researchers to effectively examine and address social issues by combining information and approaches from several disciplines. Multidisciplinary research focuses on 'outsourcing of knowledge' and sharing it in order to solve and resolve problems in many contexts. This promotes critical thinking, creativity and invention in producing real world-world solutions. It also fosters a more inclusive and comprehensive worldview that takes into accounts various viewpoints and experiences within cultures.

The conference provides a platform to the researchers, students, scholars, academicians, faculties and teachers to share and exchange their research findings and views on development of recent trends in the multidisciplinary research in various thrust areas of humanities and social sciences.
